

Following Unsuccessful Treatment

Finding support

You have just had some very upsetting news and something you have worked hard for and longed for has not happened. People react to this in very different ways. If the people around you manage the disappointment differently it does not mean they do not care, but that their personalities, past experiences and ways of coping are different.

This leaflet will help you identify ways you can find support from within yourself and from the people around you. The MFS Forum is a 24/7 patient group where registered users may have experienced similar outcomes to their own fertility treatments and offer each other constant support and empathy - the MFS Forum is available via www.midlandfertility.com. If you need further support you can find a counsellor through your GP or via the MFS Counselling Advice Line on 01332 694622, which is available from 9am to 10pm, 365 days a year. This is particularly important if you still feel very low six to eight weeks after the treatment outcome, or if at any time you feel severely depressed.

First reactions

Over the next few days, weeks or maybe even months, it is likely you will experience a wide range of emotions that are normal in the circumstances but which can feel disturbing and overwhelming from time to time. These may include deep sadness, a sense of failure and hopelessness and anger, or guilt that you may have done something wrong either before or during treatment. None of this is true but it does not make the feeling go away!

Sometimes you may have physical symptoms such as a headache, cough, stomach pain or stiff muscles. You may find you cry a lot or that your sleep or appetite is disturbed. You may not feel like meeting people, or that you avoid certain social situations where families or children will be present.

What can you do?

Here are some ideas you may like to consider:

- acknowledge the feelings and understand that they are to be expected
- use your existing good support systems, such as family, friends, community or spiritual leaders. Let them know what you find helpful. This is more likely to be practical help or a listening ear rather than advice at this point in time
- recall what things have helped you in a past crisis and try it again
- exercise, get plenty of fresh air and rest, try relaxation techniques and pamper yourself stick to normal and usual routines in this time of uncertainty. This includes regular meals and sleep patterns
- express your feelings through activities that appeal to you, such as writing or painting or keeping a diary
- distract yourself from sad thoughts by pleasurable activities or company
- write down a list of those things where you have achieved success, however small. This could be something at home or work or things that went well through treatment.

Next steps

When you feel you are ready and the emotions connected to the loss or disappointment are manageable, it is time to consider what you can do next. The staff at MFS can talk to you about the implications of further or different treatment, or help you to consider any non-treatment related alternatives. But they will wait until you contact them as they do not want you to feel under pressure to talk or to have to consider any fertility treatment again. You may want to explore other options and you will find some useful contacts at the end of this leaflet.

It is useful to consider how well you managed to deal with failure and uncertainty and take account of it when you plan your next move:

- can you personally deal with these emotions again?
- can your relationships deal with these emotions again?
- are there some things you would do differently next time?

Useful contacts

In addition to the MFS Counselling Advice Line on 01332 694622 (which is available from 9am to 10pm, 365 days a year) some patients have found these organisations useful. All have links to other information and agencies that you may also find helpful.
